

Actualités 19th juillet 2021

What does pastoralism have to do with climate change?

Climate change is making life hard for livestock herders in drylands, but sustainable practices can support resilience and carbon-rich ecosystems.

Éditeur Climate Home News

Par { "@context": "https://schema.org", "author": { "@context": "https://schema.org", "@type": "Person", "name": "Polly Ericksen", "url":

"https://www.sparc-knowledge.org/about-us/contributors/authors/polly-ericksen" } } Polly Ericksen { "@context": "https://schema.org", "author": { "@context": "https://schema.org", "@type": "Person", "name": "Mairi Dupar", "url":

"https://www.sparc-knowledge.org/about-us/contributors/authors/mairi-dupar" } } Mairi Dupar

Africa

Africa

A cattle trader at the animal market in Forobaranga, West Darfur - Image by Albert González Farran / UNAMID - CC BY-NC-ND 2.0

The pastoralist way of life offers a real route to climate change adaptation and resilience for the communities that practice it: livestock are an asset that helps families manage the shocks and stresses of extreme weather and climate.

Read more in this article for Climate Home News.

Source URL: <https://www.sparc-knowledge.org/node/68>